The Federal Trade Commission today launched a new Office of Technology that will strengthen the FTC's ability to keep pace with technological challenges in the digital marketplace by supporting the agency's law enforcement and policy work.

"For more than a century, the FTC has worked to keep pace with new markets and ever-changing technologies by building internal expertise," said Chair Lina M. Khan. "Our office of technology is a natural next step in ensuring we have the in-house skills needed to fully grasp evolving technologies and market trends as we continue to tackle unlawful business practices and protect Americans."

The Office of Technology will have dedicated staff and resources, and will be headed by Chief Technology Officer Stephanie T. Nguyen.
